

NUVIO × FILLO BAKES

The Fillo Experience.

We placed a real order on the current site and stopped one click before paying. We tore down fifteen of the best food and D2C sites, sourced twenty-eight principles of buying psychology, and drew what the new experience will be. All of it, condensed to fifteen slides.

AUGUST 2026 • WALK OF 27 AUG • 150+ SOURCES ARCHIVED • SCREENS REDRAWN WITH EXACT STRINGS

Seven surfaces stand between craving and paying.

i Contact details asked three times. The order reviewed three times. The address form starts over on a second checkout, in Western shape, on a myshopify.com address.

ii Serviceability is never checked. The site never asks where the customer is. Any address in India passes, deliverable or not.

iii The chosen date and slot vanish on the payment screen. Today is greyed out with no stated rule. The last words before paying: "No changes can be made after payment."

iv And the price changes at the door. Next slide.

The site promised ₹420. The last screen asked for ₹470.

Total	₹420
Pay ₹420 & Place Order

SCREEN SIX • SHOPIFY
Subtotal	₹400
Shipping • Local delivery	₹50
Estimated taxes	₹20
Total	₹470

An unexpected cost at the end is the most documented reason carts die, behind roughly half of all abandonments. The button that said "Pay ₹420" was a written promise; the brand breaks it inside its own checkout.

Everything else on this page is friction. This one is a broken promise.

Bakery sites sell romance or logistics. The winners put a logistics sentence inside a romance slot.

Fifteen teardowns split cleanly: the shokupan houses and Levain sell feeling; Blue Tokai and Hotplate sell certainty. The two that convert best do both with one move. GAIL's header reads "Order by 11am tomorrow for delivery on Sunday." Levain puts fulfilment first in the navigation.

Fillo is a logistics operation wearing a romance product: a moving van, a weekly window, a two-hour slot, all carrying warm bread.

The whole site is that one move, repeated. A certainty sentence inside every warm moment.

Three findings carry the whole experience.

The wait is an asset.

People prefer a longer wait with visible effort; shown work raised perceived food quality 22 percent. The order-to-Saturday gap becomes a narrated bake with real timestamps, not friction to hide.

BUELL & NORTON • BUELL, KIM & TSAY, MGMT SCIENCE

Honest scarcity outsells clocks.

Across 416 measured effects, real supply caps beat every other scarcity type, especially for experiences. "We bake 40. 12 left." needs no manufacturing; countdown evidence is vendor folklore.

BARTON ET AL. 2022, JOURNAL OF RETAILING

Show the crumb, shrink the choice.

Interior-revealing food shots beat intact ones in preregistered field tests; the torn loaf is the default image. And 23 products overwhelm a first-timer: three doors first, the range after.

LIU 2026, MARKETING LETTERS • CHERNEV ET AL. 2015

Held honestly: the eggless headline is an A/B not a rollout, one famous menu-label stat sits on probation, and the society group-buy runs as a two-society pilot before any software.

Humour where they're bored. Plainness where they pay.

Seven personality brands, one law: jokes live in the FAQ, the shipping policy, the sold-out state and the newsletter ask; price and checkout stay plain everywhere. The joke escorts the fact, never replaces it. Fillo sits warm and quiet: Paper Boat's register with Graza's discipline.

On a weekly-drop model, sold-out shows five days out of seven. It is the most-read copy on the site, so it is written best.

SOLD OUT • STATUS, PROMISE, PAYOFF

"Gone for this week."

Tell me when the van's back out

One message, Sunday morning. Nothing else.

ORDER PLACED

"Got it. Your box is on Saturday's list. We'll message you Friday night with the exact spot and time."

NEWSLETTER ASK

"One message every Sunday: what we're baking, where the van will be, and a photo of whatever didn't rise properly."

Four surfaces. One price. Two ways to get bread.

LANE ONE · SCHEDULED DELIVERY

To your door, in a window you choose

The picker becomes route-aware: your area decides which days appear, the delivery fee is inside the total from the first screen, free above a threshold. The slot rides on the order to the last screen and into the confirmation message.

LANE TWO · CATCH THE VAN

Meet it at a stop, pay no delivery fee

The same checkout offers the van's stops near your area: pick a stop and a time band, the box is held on board, the tracker shows it coming. The gate becomes the free, social option.

One cart, one price shown once and never changed, one India-shaped address, one contact ask, one domain.

Four questions, answered in order.

What is this? Do you come to me? Is it worth ₹250? How do I get one? Eleven modules answer them in sequence: crumb hero, trust strip, area check, the van promoted from a hidden pill to the provenance story, today's bake with honest counts, the why-it-costs-this block after desire and before the objection.

Deliberately absent: carousels, popups, countdowns, a search field, and every number that isn't true.

Three doors in. An honest cap to come back for.

The card is the truth. The map is the feeling.

"2 stops away," never a minute count. Arrival as a band that widens honestly in traffic.

The bake strip is the Domino's move: mixed, proofed, baked, loading, with real timestamps. The labour is the value.

Off-air is designed equally. Five days a week the schedule, not the dot, is the content. Notify-me is a WhatsApp opt-in; nobody grants location permission.

The game layer copies Japan: a finite stamp rally earned at the van, never leaderboards. Public position snaps to the route, service hours only.

Tell me when the van's out

One WhatsApp nudge when we're near. At most one a day.

Built for a phone in Bengaluru.

i One payment button. UPI is roughly 85 percent of digital payments. Cash on delivery capped and priced; a returned fresh loaf is a total loss plus a lost slot.

ii Phone-first identity. The number is the account. Fillo+ currently asks email first, which is backwards.

iii Addresses shaped like India. Society, block, landmark. Never Line 1 and Line 2.

iv WhatsApp converts the blocked. Do you reach me, is it really eggless, can I get it Saturday: all three resolve in chat, every entry pre-filled with its context.

v A hard performance budget. Fast on mid-range Android on data. No carousel, lean scripts, the map loads last.

vi English interface, Kannada warmth. One thank-you line, route names, the plate. Warmth, not navigation.

Ten principles for everything we build.

1 A certainty sentence inside every warm moment.

2 Show the work; the wait is the value.

3 Real caps, live counts, no manufactured clocks.

4 The crumb is the hero image, everywhere.

5 Three doors first, twenty-three products second.

6 Humour where they're bored, plainness where they pay.

7 Sold-out is the most-read copy; write it best.

8 Stops, not minutes; bands, not promises.

9 Phone-first, UPI-first, WhatsApp as the answer channel.

10 Every number on the site is true.

The walk found a broken promise, a missing question, and a seam. The blueprints remove all three.

Price shown once and kept. Area asked first and honoured. One checkout on one domain, with the van as a first-class way to get bread. This is phase three of the six-week build; the copy is already written, and the full research sits behind every slide.
